While the sub-ject of his address last night was the Memphis and Selma Railroad, he at considerable length discussed the causes of the busines prostration of the South, and the means of restoring vigor and health. To our mind, his suggestions were eminently wise and feasible, and he pressed them home upon his hearers with great weight of argument and a profusion of illustration. He plainty and in a busi-cess like way discussed the proposed railroad in its relations to the interests of the cities at either end and the country along the line, and the means through which it is thought possible to build it.
